Carole Feuerman | I Am Mine, Without Permission

Ethan Cohen Gallery

225 W 17th St, New York, NY 10011

June 11th – July 25th, 2026

Opening Reception: Thursday, June 11th, 2026, 6 – 8 pm

Ethan Cohen Gallery is pleased to present I Am Mine, Without Permission, the first solo exhibition of pioneering sculptor Carole Feuerman with the gallery. On view at 225 W 17th Street in Chelsea, the exhibition brings together a focused selection of formative works spanning the 1970s through the early 1990s, many of which are featured in Feuerman's recent publication I AM MINE. The exhibition follows Feuerman's recognition with the 2026 Lifetime Achievement Award from the International Sculpture Center (Pittsburgh, PA), honoring a career that has fundamentally reshaped the language of contemporary sculpture.

While Feuerman is internationally celebrated for her iconic swimmers and monumental superrealist sculptures, I Am Mine, Without Permission returns viewers to an earlier and more intimate body of work. These fragmented torsos, isolated limbs, partial figures, and psychologically charged reliefs reveal an artist already pushing the boundaries of realism, embodiment, and feminine selfhood decades before such conversations became central to contemporary discourse.

Created primarily during the 1970s, the works emerge from a moment of radical experimentation in Feuerman's practice. Rather than presenting the body as idealized totality, she fractures and crops it. Hands clutch fabric. A torso presses through a wall. A body reclines, incomplete yet deeply present. Clothing becomes both shield and vulnerability. The viewer is denied the comfort of wholeness and instead confronted with physicality in fragments: intimate, sensual, humorous, uneasy, and defiantly human.

At a moment when discussions surrounding women's autonomy, sexuality, and personal freedom were rapidly entering public consciousness, Feuerman approached the body with unusual candor. Many of these works challenged prevailing conventions of representation and were considered too provocative for widespread exhibition in their time. Rather than idealizing the figure, Feuerman presented bodies as sites of desire, vulnerability, intimacy, and self-possession. Viewed today, nearly fifty years later, the works feel remarkably contemporary, their originality and emotional honesty revealing just how far ahead of their moment they truly were.

Works such as Hand on Bra (1976), Three Hands (1976) and Suspenders (1976), collapse distinctions between sculpture, object, and lived body. Several of these works also reflect Feuerman's close observation of the social transformations taking place around her. Three Hands, for example, originated as a portrait of a close friend and his partners, quietly acknowledging forms of intimacy and identity that remained largely absent from mainstream artistic representation at the time. Feuerman transforms resin, marble, silicone, lacquer, and oil into surfaces that appear startlingly alive, while simultaneously exposing the constructed nature of desire, identity, and representation itself. In many of the works, bodies appear caught between emergence and concealment, possession and autonomy. The exhibition's title, I Am Mine, Without Permission, speaks directly to this tension: an assertion of selfhood, agency, and bodily ownership.

Importantly, these works also demonstrate Feuerman's early technical innovations within superrealism. Long before hyperreal figuration became widely institutionalized, Feuerman was pioneering new sculptural methods capable of translating flesh, fabric, moisture, and psychological presence into startling physical form. Yet unlike pure illusionism, her realism is never simply about replication. Beneath the virtuosity lies emotional complexity. The body becomes a site of memory, intimacy, vulnerability, performance, and resistance.

The exhibition coincides with the recent release of I AM MINE, a publication devoted to this critical period in Feuerman's career. The book features essays by six distinguished female art critics and historians — Gloria Moure, Leanne Sacramone, Victoria Noel-Johnson, Helga Marsala, Barbara Buhler Lynes, and Tone Lyngstad Nyaas — each offering distinct perspectives on the significance of Feuerman's work and its enduring relevance within contemporary art history.

Across nearly five decades, Carole Feuerman has remained singular in her ability to merge technical mastery with emotional immediacy. I A Mine, Without Permission offers viewers a rare opportunity to encounter the origins of that vision: raw, intimate, fragmented, and profoundly ahead of its time.

Carole Feuerman (b. 1945) is widely regarded as one of the most important sculptors associated with superrealism. Her work has been exhibited internationally and is included in major public and private collections worldwide.

About Ethan Cohen Gallery:

Ethan Cohen Gallery is a curatorial force in global contemporary art, known for championing both emerging and established voices across continents. With a foundation in post-war contemporary, the gallery has earned international recognition for its early and sustained support of Chinese Avant-Garde artists, as well as its forward-thinking embrace of emerging talent and contemporary African art. Ethan Cohen's eye for the extraordinary has helped launch the careers of artists who are now widely celebrated, while continuing to introduce collectors and institutions to the most compelling new voices of each generation. As noted in Slant Magazine, Ethan Cohen has been called "one of the most influential art dealers in the world."

Founded in 1987 as Art Waves/Ethan Cohen in SoHo, the gallery was among the first to present Chinese experimental art to the U.S. audience. Today, Ethan Cohen Gallery operates from two locations in Chelsea, NYC and The KuBe Art Center in Beacon, New York—a 127,000 square foot interdisciplinary hub for exhibitions, performance, and artistic dialogue. The gallery also maintains a strong global presence through participation in major international art fairs. Across all platforms, Ethan Cohen Gallery curates museum-quality shows, nurtures cross-cultural dialogue, and remains committed to discovering and amplifying radical, relevant, and resonant art.

Gallery hours are Tuesday to Saturday from 11 am to 6pm.
